CANON OF THE YELLOWSTONE.

It has been the privilege of the very few to witness the wonderful grandeur and awful splendors of this yawning chasm. No language can sufficiently depict the appalling splendors to be seen from its dizzy verge. Away down beyond the 2,500 feet of solid walls of rock lies the surging river spun out like a slender thread, but so far from the eye and ear of the observer as to fail to impart the slightest token that it moves. A feeling of awe holds the observer in a spell of weird fascination, from which he finds it difficult to tear himself away lest any movement on his part might induce those solid rocks to give way and precipitate him into the depths below. Those who have ventured down these dizzy heights, state that when at the verge of the river, stars were plainly seen in the sky above, so much of the sunlight being obscured by the walls of the chasm.
